DENISE LEITH has taught international relations, Middle East politics, Australian foreign policy and Australian politics at Sydney's Macquarie University. The University of Hawaii Press published her first book The Politics of Power: Freeport in Suharto's Indonesia in 2002. Her second book, Bearing Witness: The Lives of War Correspondents and Photojournalists, was published in 2004 by Random House Australia. It looked at the world of war, disease and famine through the eyes and voices of the world's top war correspondents and photojournalists. In 2005, as part of the committee of International PEN, Sydney Centre, she shared the Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Community Award for work with writers held in detention. Denise currently lives on Sydney's Northern Beaches and writes and teaches part time at university.

WHAT REMAINS follows the tumultuous life of journalist Kate Price from her first assignment as a naive and idealistic young correspondent in Riyadh in 1991, to Baghdad in 2004, where she can't feel anything unless it cuts her to the bone. We track her through the war zones of the Arabian Peninsula, Palestine, South Africa, Bosnia, Rwanda, Chechnya and Iraq, through harrowing scenes of violence and destruction as she pays the price of bearing witness to unspeakable calamity and cruelty. Yet in the face of that horror, where friendship can be life's currency and love is often fleeting, comfort can be found in the smallest and most tender moments.

What Remains is an epic story of love, war, friendship and ultimately of hope: gripping, confronting and unbearably heartbreaking. It will stay with you forever.
